

If someone is illegally in the USA majority of the things that they come forth to try to confess can not be believed to begin with as they have already come into this country in a illegal way and could be deceiving our systems by claiming they were a victim of extortion. How can this be proven? You can not record another individual without their consent, unless they are in your private residence. Its impossible to prove an illegal persons case without having witnesses. It will be he say or she say type of thing. In most cases the extortion would not take place via mail, email or phone call but more than likely in a work place setting. The extortion would not take place in front of others but more than likely in a isolated setting and most definitely be targeted at women since they are more vulnerable to scams.

If an illegal reports her co-worker, boss or some random individual and states that they have been extorting her/him and demanding that they pay them money or they will report them, how is this to be proven? Based on a information given by a lawyer he states "First, it must be shown that the defendant made a threat. Second, the threat must be associated with an intent to exact some form of payment from the victim. Third, the threat must be shown to be capable of inducing fear in the victim (even if the threat was not ultimately received)". This all makes perfect sense but how does the illegal prove that a threat was made? How does the illegal prove that they rendered payment to the extorter? Was the illegal truly afraid?

The conclusion I draw is that a person extorting anyone will not leave a paper trail and the extortion may happen by different people and those different people may always demand cash or something that isn't traceable. How do you prove that they are telling the truth? By just believing them? That is not enough! I am against this bill. - Shane Mitchell
