Kathleen Kreiselmeyer Against Children's Health Defense	I am unable to understand how anyone can believe they are in charge of child gender identity or change rather than parents. Politicians and government have NO place in this decision making process no matter how much money you've been paid by outsider influence. Perhaps you who are to Protect and Serve need different "jobs" and need to leave constituents alone whom are being Promoted and Served by YOU.
Julianna Wainright For themselves	I have always been a highly motivated learner as is a normality for Gifted and Talented Students. I learn best in classrooms that encourage me to excel as well as challenge me to become a better learner. Because of this I have found great interest in advanced courses such as AP classes and concurrent enrollment, having a comprehensive record of an institution's most recent awards of postsecondary transfer credits would be invaluable. My GT advisor is a brilliant woman who I have worked closely with to carefully craft my class schedule to best benefit me. We look at the classes that I have the most interest in and relate the classes available to my goals. While it is easy to see what classes will best support my aspirations it is significantly more difficult to understand which classes would be accepted at the institutions I wish to attend. Because there is no cohesive way to get the information I need to make decisions when it comes to class choice, I often have to hope that the institutions I want to go to will accept my transferable credits. Having hope does not guarantee that the work put into those classes will ultimately be rewarded. Advanced courses require a significant amount of hard work. Spending time to do well in these classes just to later discover they won't be accepted at certain postsecondary institutions is frustrating. Even working with my GT advisor it is extremely difficult to ensure that the classes I am picking will support my future. A lack of information makes registration time very stressful. In order to make information more readily available, reduce stress, and support not only GT students but the entirety of the student body, the implementation of a postsecondary credit transfer website is necessary.
